A Discussion on Achieving the Paris Climate Goals in the Covid-19 Era

Dear Edward,

As the world continues to battle the Covid-19 pandemic, we face a worsening climate crisis: the globe has already reached an average temperature rise of 1.1°C above pre-industrial levels, and a world of 1.5°C must be avoided at all costs. Today, we have to think carefully about the future that we want to create. We cannot return to 'normal' because the pre-COVID world was not normal.

In response, F20, One Earth, and The University of Sydney have developed a new policy briefing on Achieving the Paris Climate Goals in the COVID-19 Era. The briefing provides guidance for foundations and philanthropists, policy and decision-makers, as well as for civil society, business and the financial sector for how a better recovery from the COVID-19 pandemic can be achieved.

We invite you to join a virtual discussion co-hosted by F20 – a global network of foundations and philanthropic organizations calling for joint, transnational action towards sustainable development – and One Earth – a bold, new philanthropic initiative organization working to accelerate collective action to stay below 1.5°C in global average temperature rise – to answer the question, How Can the Paris Climate Goals be Achieved in the COVID-19 era? The featured speakers will discuss how we must prioritize a coordinated global response that helps solve the climate crisis and makes our societies more resilient and less destructive.

Speakers:

Stefan Schurig, Secretary General, F20

Dr. Sven Teske, Research Director at the Institute for Sustainable Futures, University of Technology Sydney

Karl Burkart, Co-Founder and Managing Director, One Earth
